A Story of Northern Indiana. the traveler might find evidence of adlog cabin, planted on the edge of a clearing made by the pioneer's ax. Broad expanses of prairie lay to the north, without the sign of a human habitation, ous white man, and these signs were principally the "blazed" paths, made distinguishable after twilight set in. Here and there they had been marked out by hunters, or county surveyors, and they were always a welcome sight to one who found himself lost in the "trackless woods." Occasionally the long-deserted camp of the departed Indian was met, adding to the sense of loneliness that fell upon the rover venturing to traverse these wilds, and what was still more startling was the appearance now and then, in some especially secluded spot, of a red "untutored savage," in these instances,
